

MEMORIAL'S GREED PUTS EVERYONE AT RISK

For too long, Santa Rosa Memorial Hospital has been slashing jobs, cutting corners on Personal Protective Equipment, and stockpiling cash for its out-of-state corporate owner, Providence St. Joseph Health.

Now, as COVID-19 cases are rising, Memorial is trying to cut our sick leave and double the cost of our healthcare premiums while making us work through a pandemic without enough PPE.

Our hospital has left us with no choice. We're going on strike to make Santa Rosa Memorial put its patients and caregivers first.

Memorial has reported a $201 million profit since 2017. It can afford:

- A contract that doesn't cut benefits and double worker health care premiums
- Safe staffing levels
- Adequate PPE to keep workers and patients safe

We never stopped working during the wildfires.
But we can't keep patients safe during a pandemic if we can't afford our health insurance or obtain sufficient PPE.

MEMORIAL HOSPITAL

"Santa Rosa Memorial is our regional trauma center. Its caregivers have come through for us in crisis after crisis. Now we must come through for them when their health care is at risk. Essential workers need essential benefits. I support these workers, and Providence should be giving them what they need."
